The other great question in time travel stories is whether and how the traveler will reconnect with the present. Outside your own present time, you are to some extent lost. Let's look at that this morning. What it means and feels like to be lost. I could of course have selected other ways to explore what it means to be lost. Lost in space.

This is the first time I've seen such a game done well in Twine. It is very hard; it has been given a 'nasty' forgiveness rating by the author, and that is completely appropriate. There are frequent deaths and ways to lock yourself out of victory, but there is a multi-save feature which helps. The first part of the game is an escape the room puzzle.

Lost in Time. There's no movement in our camp the next day--or the same day, or whatever day it is now--until the sun is high. We stumble out of the tent, the sand warm on our bare feet, to munch granola bars and watch gulls and eagles in the mudflats near the river. We're feeling at home here. Our skin is leathery.
